Abstract:	In 1698, the area of Watertown that would later be named Weston, was set off as the "Farmers' Precinct" based around the newly established Church of Christ. The first four ministers of the church were considered progressive and by the 1830s the theology of the church was beginning to shift towards Unitarianism. In 1867 a new church covenant was adopted that established the church as a Unitarian church. The collection includes vital records, meeting minutes, a daily ministerial journal, and early manuscript writings of Edmund Hamilton Sears.

Historical Note

In 1698, the area of Watertown that would later be named Weston, was set off as the "Farmers' Precinct" based around the newly established Church of Christ. By 1700 a meeting house had been constructed and finally in 1709 Rev. Joseph Mors was ordained as the first minister of the church. In 1713 the "Farmers' Precinct" was established as the town of Weston.

The first four ministers of the church were considered progressive and by the 1830s the theology of the church was beginning to shift towards Unitarianism. Unlike many Congregational churches during the 1830s, this gradual shift did not lead to a significant rift within the church community or the creation of an opposing Evangelical Congregational church. The shift towards Unitarianism was made official with the adoption of the 1867 church covenant which also renamed the church to the First Congregational (Unitarian) Church in Weston. The name changed again in 1991 to The First Parish Church in Weston. The First Parish Church in Weston remains active today and is a member of the Unitarian Universalist Association.
